Galdus was buried with great lamentation in most pompous maner, and laid in a goodlie toome which was raised with mightie huge stones, having a great number of obelisks set up round about it according to the maner. Further more, to the end his memorie should ever endure, the countrie where he fought last with the Romans was called Galdia, after his name.—Hollinshed's Chronicles of Scotland, vide "Tours in Galloway."
